Russo-Turkish War of 1768-1774

After 40 years of peace, a new Russo-Turkish war sprung from a border conflict and ended with large Russian territorial expansion. The most important land battles were Larga and Kagul (1770) and at sea, the Battle of Chesme. As a result of the war, Russia gained the territory of Crimea and domination over the mouth of the Danube.

Russo-Turkish War of 1787-1790

As with the previous conflict, this war started as an attempt by Turkey to take back territories lost previously. It proved disastrous for the Sublime Porte. The incompetence of the Turkish armies was exacerbated by the fact that Turkey was also warring with Austria at the same time. The Austrians took Belgrade, while Russia affirmed its annexation of Crimea and also took Bessarabia (present day Moldova). Kinburn (1787), the taking of Ochakov, and the surprise attack on Izmail by the future Generalissimo Suvorov were Russia's most signal victories.

Russo-Swedish War of 1788-1790

Concerned about Russian's expansion at Turkey's expense, the West exerted pressure on Sweden's King Gustav III to take up arms against Russia. Gustav also saw a war with Russia as a useful smokescreen for domestic problems in Sweden. Not surprisingly, the war proved very unpopular in Sweden and Finland. Half-hearted efforts led to two failed naval expeditions to invade Reval (Estonia) and Vyborg. The Russian navy under Admiral Chichagov besieged the Swedish fleet, and Sweden lost 6 battleships and 4 frigates. Sweden, though, was able to regroup and win a decisive battle. Nearly 10,000 Russian sailors were killed and a third of the Russian fleet was destroyed. This disaster led to quick peace negotiations and a peace treaty in 1790.

Catherine II issued two medals, one for the naval battles in Finnish waters and another to commemorate the peace treaty.

Russo-Swedish War of 1808-1809

From the time of the Novgorod Republic to Imperial times, Russia fought with Sweden on and off for some 800 years. The last war took place from 1808 to 1809. After the Tilsit Peace Treaty with Napoleon, Russia tried to make Sweden an ally against Britain. Sweden's King Gustav refused, and in February 1808, Russia invaded Finland. By March 1809 the entire Finnish territory was in Russian hands, and the Finnish Diet was organized. In March 1809 three Russian contingents crossed into Sweden – 6,000 troops under Count Shuvalov reached Sweden over land through the north shore of the Bothnia Gulf passing Tornio, 5,000 troops under the future Commander-in-Chief Barclay De Tolly crossed the Bothnia Gulf, walking over ice and through knee deep snow, while 17,000 troops under the future hero of Borodino, Prince Bagration crossed to the Aland Islands then toward Stockholm. As an outcome of the war Finland was annexed by Russia for over 100 years, Sweden's King Gustav IV Adolf lost his throne, and Sweden became a neutral country, not participating in any wars now for 200 years.

The War with Napoleon 1812-1814

On June 24, 1812, Napoleon's army of 650,000 men invaded Russia. After the indecisive Battle of Borodino (near Moscow), the Russian troops retreated. Napoleon entered Moscow on the 14th of September. As Muscovites fled, 80 percent of the city was burnt to the ground. Some sources say that Moscow's governor ordered the conflagration; others claim that it was accidental. In any case, Napoleon found that he occupied an empty, barren place and so left before cold and hunger of the winter could devastate his army. His retreat from Moscow west, however, was even harsher – no food, no forage and no shelter from the frigid weather. Only 40,000 of French troops reached Paris.

Three awards were created for the participants of this war: the 1812 Medal (in silver and bronze), the cross for priests, and a medal in commemoration of the Russian Army's entry into Paris. Independently a German medal was minted to commemorate the Battle of Leipzig.

All three Russian awards and the German medal are offered here.

War with Turkish Empire of 1828-1829

As a spillover from the Greek War of Independence, English, French and Russian ships destroyed the Ottoman fleet at Navarino in 1827. Turkey responded by closing the Dardanelles to Russian ships and effectively created a naval blockade.

Russian troops under General Dibitch crossed the Danube river and entered what is now Rumania, while on the Caucasian front, the army under General Paskevich took Erivan and Kars. By August 1828, Russian troops were just 50 miles from Constantinople, and the Sultan sought peace. As a result, Georgia and Armenia were formally recognized by Turkey as part of Russia, while Serbia, Moldavia and Wallachia became autonomous. The fate of Kars was unusual – it was returned to Turkey after 1829, retaken by Russia during the Crimean War in 1853, returned again, then taken again in the war of 1877-78 and finally became Turkish after World War I.

Participants of the war of 1828-1829 as well as the sailors who participated in the Navarino battle were awarded a medal. Both variants are offered here.

The Polish Uprising of 1830-1831

After the Vienna Congress of 1815, Poland, or actually the part annexed by Russia in 1772, 1793 and 1795, received special status within the Russian Empire. Wearied of Russian rule, Polish patriots rose up in 1830. The uprising was crushed by Russian troops under the command of General Paskevich, who was summoned by Nicholas I after the death of Commander-in-Chief General Dibitch from cholera in early 1831.

As part of Poland's incorporation, its two Orders, the White Eagle and Stanislaus had become part of Russian award system. And after the Uprising, Nicholas I in order to humiliate the Poles eliminated the most coveted Polish award, the Virtuti Militari, which was similar in status to the U.S. Congressional Medal of Honor and the British Victoria Cross, and created a mockery – the Virtuti Militari cross with the date 1831 instead of 1792 as on the original. Nicholas I awarded this „cross“ as well as a medal „for taking Warsaw“ to all 100,000 troops who participated in the suppression of the rebellion and in taking Warsaw.

Russian Wars in the Caucasus, 1796-1864

Russian expansion into the Caucasus lasted for more than 60 years. It began during the 1796 expedition of Valerian Zubov, a younger brother of Catherine the Great's favorite, who took the ancient city of Derbent on the Caspian Sea from Persia, and later seized Baku, Shemakha and Ganja. But the most brutal battles were not with Persia or Turkey, but with the small khanates and nations along the foothills of the Caucasus range. The Caucasian wars culminated in the siege of Dagestan's mountain aoul Gunib, the last stand of Imam Shamil. Shamil's 400 soldiers stood against 25,000 Russian troops and were subdued only when a tunnel was built that allowed Russian troops to attack from the rear.

Russian expansion into Central Asia 1873-1881

St. Petersburg had been trying to expand into Central Asia since early the 19th century. The Kara-Kum and Kyzyl-Kum deserts created a natural defense barrier for the Central Asian Khanates. But in 1873 the Russian Governor General of Central Asia led his troops from their new base in Tashkent and conquered Khiva, a khanate at the mouth of the great river Amu. In 1875, the Kokand Khanate was annexed and finally, after one failed expedition, the 1881 expedition under the command of General Skobelev crossed the desert from Caspian seashore and took the Turkoman citadel of Geok-Tepe. This expedition made Skobelev a national hero. A equestrian statue of Skobelev was raised in the very center of Moscow.

Three medals were instated by Alexander II to award troops who participated in these three successful expeditions. All three are offered here.
